Dermarolling + minoxidil was a huge, hot topic on many of the hair loss communities for a time. It got shut down because of the stupid sensibilities of plebs and pussies (ingesting or injecting strange chemicals? Absolutely fine! Bleeding from superficial wounds to the scalp? 😰 this is too much! how barbaric!)

Let me be very clear about something:

Even supposedly die-hard "I'll do anything, including rubbing cum on my head" hair loss forum morons could not consistently stick to this regime, so the average person who avoids discomfort like the plague has no hope of making this work.

1 proper wounding session a week along with regular use of minoxidil twice daily is not a lot to ask, but you'd be surprised how many people weaselled their way out of this and then said the study had to be bullshit, even in the face of their own admittance that they were not consistent and often times went easy or just didn't roll at all. 😊 The other side of it is of course, that many people don't want to be going to work with a red scalp for 2-3 days after every week and having people ask questions.

I guess it's a question of how badly you want your hair. The success stories from this kept it up indefinitely, and did so consistently. They are few. The majority could not do it even for 6 months (the very very bare minimum to determine if a hair loss treatment is having any effect). For people with significant hair loss this is the only viable treatment for actual regrowth, I imagine the results would be even better combined with regular use of RU58841

Do you have personal experience with it?

I used shit dermaroller 0.75mm once a week for temples

Shall I use a different dermaroller?

i have some experience with it, i had to stop unfortunately because of some other shit going on, started back up again yesterday. The size used in the study is 1.5mm. Yeah, the big boys.

one of those dermapens or pads would probably be better IMO. would create cleaner, probably deeper, wound channels and wouldn't be quite as painful I imagine.

do you use minox on all the hair or just the area where you're balding btw why did it get shut down on hairloss forum if it helps with hair loss I don't get it btw results for 12 weeks seem too good to be true

i use it all over the MPB region so really the temples, front, top and crown of scalp.

I should say there was a few forums where it didnt get shut down, people just stopped talking about it because like this forum, hair loss communities are full of people who want to bitch and moan and type long "woe is me" type dramas than they want to attempt to solve their problem.

What do you do when the hair is grown back? Do you continue the weekly wounding sessions forever?
